Tales from the World of the Witcher (TOTWOTW) is an open community Expanded Universe project that automatically sorts creations on the site by default. This allows new users to immediately join the collaboration and access a wide range of articles covering subjects from individual potions to the many worlds that Ciri's Elder Blood allows her to traverse. The project primarily follows the Book and Game canon (incorporating also Gwent: Rogue Mage, although this game/game mode is not considered part of the CD PROJEKT RED canon), including the semi-canonical book that gives the timeline its name, while also adding elements from the Polish comics, the Netflix and The Hexer adaptations. Additionally, it draws on elements from other works by Sapkowski, such as the tabletop role-playing games of the 90s and the Hussite Trilogy (which may have multiverse connections with The Witcher).

General notes before continuing reading ↗

- Article free to edit, but please respect what has been added previously. If you want to suggest any important changes to the timeline please contact the administration, more specifically admin Witcher190 (in case it takes time to reply for this admin, you can write to Adalwulf of Aedirn) If you have an issue or problem with the lore you can dispute it on: <https://discord.gg/rUHcZeQ> in the Lore Dispute channel.
- Book events are marked with Bold.
- Events or adaptations of the book Tales of The World of The Witcher are marked with:

Since following Sapkowski's spirit of subverting tropes, things like the appearance of guns in the world, is given much later, unlike in the book, so as not to fall into the cliché of Modern Age fantasy of arriving in that era and having that kind of weaponry. Allowing another approach to things like the colonization of the Western Continent or the Vrans cities of this continent, which in the original book, fall into the cliché of the lizarmen are pre-Columbian fantasy cultures of so many other universes. In the case of the site, we have another approach, which is Apumayu Basin, basically pre-Columbian cultures with a level of Sandalpunk technology that reaches the medieval. In addition to moving away from franchises like Fable where the appearance of guns in an earlier time, is present.

- Events from the games, R. Talsorian The Witcher : Tabletop RPG or Dark Horse comics (Game canon) are highlighted with underline.
- Adaptations of Netflix's The Witcher events are marked with *: Because Netflix's approach to The Witcher presents, already in its own material contradictions with each other, and not just the books or the games, the events you will see in the timeline are very free adaptations made by the community. Mainly, adapting it if possible to the timeline presented by the books or the games.
- Events or adaptations of tabletop role-playing games and The Hexer are marked with : Regarding tabletop role-playing games from the 1990s and the polish TV Show and movie, it's something similar of what happens with Netflix's The Witcher but on a smaller scale. Events that do not contradict the canon of books and games (for example, the story of Dragonfly) are taken into account, others are more free adaptations of the community. Anyway, most of what you can find on the site are adaptations / expansions of the story of characters from these media.
- Events of the Polish comics are highlighted with style text small
- Events taken or adapted from fangames, shortfilms and other fanmedia are taking into account occasionally as a tribute to the community / fandom and are marked cursive and bold.
 - Short stories created in the site are also marked in this way.
- In general, it can be said that this timeline/universe project aims not only to fill gaps in The Witcher universe but also to incorporate fan creations. Moreover, in its own distinctive manner, the project strives to integrate events presented in various media in this universe into a unified and coherent timeline.
- The first draft of this timeline was proposed and written by TheSagemaster, credit where credit is due.
 1. For the starting point of the human calendar, there is literally nothing known about "the Resurrection" in the official canon. It's clearly inspired by the Christian death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, but otherwise there is annoyingly nothing else I know about it.
 2. For the timeline, because there are contradictions between the games and the books regarding the nature of the White Frost we take into account the version presented in The Witcher 3. Closing the timeline with the collapse of the civilization by an ecological disaster instead of being frozen in 3000 years by that climate change. This also would allows us to explore the nature of the multiverse in a better way, and suggest it that Ciri did not simply travel to the future of the Continent but to another version of the world, which ended up that way. For other universes / parallel timelines, you can check the Expanded Universes article.

3. Because Tales of The World of The Witcher does not present a fixed date for the Second Conjunction of the Spheres, only a range of years between the 1270s and the 1370s, the year 1358 is taken speculatively, based on a comment made by a vampire in The Witcher 3.
4. There is no known official date for the destruction of Kaer Seren. Technically, Erland's article in the official Wikia, lets you intuit it in 1160s, but of course. This contradicts the status that the Griffins had as highly respected. Which, in the 12th century, could provoke a conflict between several crowns and the mages, if it came to that, because the anti-Witcher propaganda was not yet so powerful. Besides the fact that it has not been confirmed in the timeline of the games. Added to the fact that the vast majority of schools fell in the 13th century, not the 12th. In addition to that, the books. Where Coen's recent journey to Kaer Morhen could have been influenced precisely by this factor (in the Fanon it is Keldar's orders, in book! canon, we do not know the reason). It would make sense, then, that with Kaer Morhen in decline, The Manticores likewise, so that it would be a majority of schools that fell in the 13th century, that it would be Viper, Bear, Griffin and Cat. And 1249 has been selected, so that it could also match the Griffin killed by Leo Bonhart. It would be very difficult for the remaining Griffins to have been active for such a long time without a place to spend the winter. The clearest example of this is the Vipers, with officially only Letho, the Unknown Viper Witcher, Serrit and Auckles as confirmed active members.
5. In this timeline, there is a big difference with respect to the Games canon, and is that, Brehen does not die because of the Striga, but Remus from the Netflix series but adapted. This is so, because of the potential of the Cat of Iello, and also to give a justification to Berengar to stay with the Wolves, and remain a witcher, even though he is supposed to "hate" it (instead of retiring like Jad Karadin). All of this, then, was due to his friendship with Remus. Which, after his death, would give more weight to Berengar's motivation to join the Salamandra and betray the Wolves.
6. Regarding the status of the Northen Kingdoms after The Witcher 3, this gets into some difficulty, because the games offer multiple endings, where either Radovid rules the north, Dijkstra rules, or Nilfgaard conquers everyone. In the case of this timeline, it takes into account the "canonical" post-Third Northen War events presented by CD PROJEKT RED in Gwent, that is, the Iron Judgment expansion.
